YOU'RE KIDDING ME

PETER PANS | Boys who never grew up show off their outer child

"Stoogeapalooza" is must-see TV on Saturday nights for Tom Ciesielka. His snack of choice? Fruit Loops.

Technically, Tom Ciesielka is an adult. He is 47 years old, he's married, he even owns his own public relations agency.

But in many ways, this North Sider never grew up. There's the extensive toy collection, for instance, including the clanging monkey who screams when you bang its head.

He likes to sing, too. In public. Silly songs, loud enough to amuse the people around him without warranting police intervention.

Ciesielka says he has a "playful and joyful" spirit. "I eat Fruit Loops like caviar while watching 'Stoogeapalooza' on Saturday nights," he says. (His wife steers clear, in polite disgust.)

He's a big kid. And he's not the only one.

"Peter Pan has nothing on parents nowadays, the Boomers and Gen X'ers who only want to preserve their youth," says Aaron Cooper, a clinical psychologist and educator with the Family Institute at Northwestern University.

Brian Simms would agree with that. He goes beyond the call of duty in his activity with his kids' Boy Scouts groups. He is a pumpkin-carving connoisseur and will not hesitate to shave his head if he's lost a bet. Best of all, he works at Chicago's headquarters for Radio Flyer as a vice president of sales and customer service.

"We get to design wagons and ride-on toys every day, so it's hard not to feel like a kid," Simms says. "I've been known to ride the My 1st Scooter around the office, even though the age range for that item is 2 to 5 years old." That's one sturdily built product.

Cooper approves. Up to a point. "We can, all of us, incorporate elements of childlike interest into our lives," he says. "We call it play. Imagination. Creativity. Fun."

Regardless of how we play, though, Cooper thinks we have to make sure we are responsible in two areas: work and love. Are we conscientious? Considerate of oth-
